PRESENTER: Robert L. Leahy, Ph.D.

We often think that the main goal in life is to experience pleasant and happy emotions and that we need to avoid any emotions that we find unpleasant. As a result, we may avoid situations that elicit these emotions, ruminate about why we feel the way we feel, feel embarrassed that we have these feelings, and try to convince ourselves that there is some way to get rid of unwanted emotions. Similar to unwanted intrusive thoughts, unpleasant emotions come back, leading to further efforts to rid ourselves of these feelings. The Emotional Schema Model that I advance rejects the idea of good and bad emotions, lower and higher self, or the possibility of a complete life without unpleasant emotions. I argue that all emotions evolved because they were adaptive in important situations and that disparaging or eliminating emotions results in self-defeating behavior. I describe both the biological and the social constructivist models of emotions, recognizing that at different times in history and in different cultures people had different theories and evaluations of emotions. Both emotional perfectionism and existential perfectionism interfere with the capability of integrating emotions into a complete life. Of particular focus in this presentation is the role of jealousy and ambivalence, problematic emotion theories and responses and possibly helpful strategies about how to cope with these inevitable and sometimes difficult experiences. Finally, I describe strategies for deepening meaning without avoiding the unpleasant emotions often associated with finding meaning.
